They are married and leave the place, and the Kapáli who had reared Kapálkundalá, having found them after a tedious search, persuades Navakumár to suffer his wife to be offered in sacrifice. She on being conducted to the river where the necessary rites of purification were to be observed, plunges into the water and is never recovered. |

| and strength, are impatient of the abject condition of their country, and always in their speeches express their desire to rid it of foreign domination. The book is composed in blank verse, and the object apparently is to parody the versification of the late M. M. Bhatt, who introduced a large number of new words and grammatical forms into the language. The writer refers throughout to the habits of drinking, the timidity, inaptitude for action, and love of speechifying, and the utter shallowness which characterise Bengalis. |                                     |           |                                  |                                                 |                          |                                                |                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                    |
